[From the N. Y. Journal of Commerce.]

A Visit to the Pyramids. GRAND CAIRO, Dec. 19 Yesterday was an eventful day in my life went to the Pyramids and gratified the long ished desire of gazing upon these mysterious n uments of past greatness. They are situated the west bank of the Nile, about twelve miles for Cairo, and five or six miles apparently from the er itself, on the edge of the great desert. W. Cairo on donkeys, just as the sun was risin pleasant company of six gentlemen attended b larger number of servants, donkey-boys and guid We met also many Arabs on our way, who w clamorous for employment, so that by the time reached the neighborhood of the Pyramids wen surrounded by a little army of ragamuffins, or n correctly, by naked men with scarcely a n cover them. Our route led us up the east ban the Nile a mile or two, to Old Cairo. Here crossed the river in very primitive boats, imque ately above the island of Rhoda, on which is he the Nilometer. This, too, is the spot which to tion declares to be the one where Moses was posed among the bulrushes. The island is cover with the richest cultivation, and with its one groves and acacias and beautiful gardens, m well remind one of the luxuries of that old East Court, when Pharaoh's daughter with her mails walked by the river's side and saw the ark and the flags, and looked upon the weeping babe a was destined to be the world's Lawgiver. The tle village on the West bank, where our boats Fine cut Tobacco, in tin nally landed us after quite a struggle with then id current, seemed to be a grain market; he quantities of corn and wheat lying exposed in open air, in the public thoroughfare. And now, after riding a full hour on a rapid you seem to be as far as ever from the Pyram You are certain when you leave the banks of Nile that they are close at hand; but two ho pass away, and still there they are, almost as tant as at first. At the close of the third hour fi Cairo we reached the edge of the desert, and fifteen minutes more I was standing in the shad of the great Pyramid of Cheops. The first impr sion was one of disappointment. It did not he as large and magnificent as my imagination pictured it. It seemed indeed but a small obj in the midst of the boundless desert, and under deep blue vault of heaven. But I soon found its littleness grew out of those illimitable obje with which I was unwittingly comparing it. 8 eral of our company began to ascend its sid climbing up over the mighty stones with the air desire to know, I feed him to ascend to the Away he sprang with the lightness of a deer, a ing from stone to stone with the agility and s pleness of a cat, never resting for a moment ill stood upon the apex. It was then, when I sav diminished form, and the apparent size of many our company scattered over the sides of the imme structure, and looked upon a friend standing a the base, that I began to comprehend something its greatness. I then walked around it, examin the huge blocks which lie in their places almost firmly as the granite in the old mountains, was in the deep sand fourteen hundred feet before! passed one of its sides, and between five and thousand feet by the time I had reached the n of departure. Take a hundred New York church of the ordinary width, and arrange them in a low square twenty-five on a side, and you we have scarcely the basement of this Pyramid. I another hundred and throw in their material the hollow square, and it would not be full. on all the stone and brick of Philadelphia and mass of stone, with the exception of a few nat passages and two comparatively small rooms. layer of blocks has been removed from the side and transported long since to Cairo for b ing purposes; and you are convinced as you! before it, that it would supply the demand of a of halt a million of people for a century, if were permitted freely to use it. It would mis thousand coliseums such as old Rome gloriel and the rains which constitute the grandest in the modern city. There is no work of out be compared with it in vastness, except it be other pyramid within a stone's throw of Che and perhaps one or two of sixteen which are ering in sublime majesty in this vicinity. time I had completed my examination of the rigr, most of my companions had returned their explorations of the interior. I met the the entrance, dripping with perspiration, but is wonder at the spectacle they had seen. Com ting myself to the guidance of the three A holding torches in their hands, I began the des into the tomb. The entrance is on the side, !" or thirty feet from the ground, and for a long tance you gradually descend through a dark sage, scarcely high enough to permit you was erect, the floor and sides and ceiling being of tian granite, and the pavement smooth and sim from the multitudes from all parts of the world pass over it. It would be scarcely possible to the descent had not foot-holes been cut in the for our aid. Having reached a depth corres ing, apparently, with the rock on which the mense mass stands, you begin to ascend-thes narrow passage leading gradually up till you to a deep and narrow chasm sunk by the si the dark path. Here we rested for a few men to take breath. The ascent was now more
